Not everyone wants a phone that fills the whole hand, and the iPhone SE and the older models with a home button still have plenty of loyal users. They are often the phone handed down to a child, kept as a spare or used by a relative who prefers a button to swipe gestures, which is exactly why a cracked screen is worth fixing rather than writing off. A phone that cost little to buy can still be well worth repairing when the repair price is modest.

Free Fusion repairs iPhones from the iPhone 5 right through to the 17 series, and that includes every iPhone SE, so older models are very much in scope. Because the home button sits at the front of these handsets, tell us if you rely on Touch ID, so that it can be discussed before any work begins. It is also worth checking that the home button still clicks properly and that the touch response is even across the whole display, because a diagnosis can then cover everything in one go. If the home button has stopped clicking, say so, since that suggests the front needs a closer look.

iPhone screen repairs start from £24.99 at our shop on the High Street in Corby, and we confirm the price for your exact model once we have seen it. Diagnosis is free for local customers, and most smartphone screen replacements are completed within about an hour phone screen repair at the Corby centre. For a phone that is only used for calls, messages and photos, a quick phone screen repair can be a very sensible way to keep it going without buying anything new.

It is worth being realistic about the age of the handset. Older models may no longer receive the newest software updates, so think about whether it still does what you need, particularly if you use banking or payment apps. If the answer is yes, the battery is often the next thing to look at, and iPhone batteries start from £19.99. A phone used by a child or a grandparent also benefits from a sturdy case and a tempered glass protector, which cost little and protect the repair. Handing a repaired phone back to a child or relative often costs far less than finding a replacement they will be comfortable using.
