Prepaid International Calling Card Adventures In Phoning

Prepaid international calling cards are what you will find inmost store selling calling cards. These have a certain amount of money on them and you slowly use it up as you make phone calls. I used these to calmly parents when I went to Acapulco in Lanstar Voice and Data, LLC college. Now the one problem is that some will warn Find more info you how much money you have left on them before you call and some will tell you after. The bad ones are the ones that dont and you are simply cut off in the middle of a conversation without warning. Also I dont know about you but I have a hard time keeping track of how long I have talked when I am on the phone. I find that 9 times out of ten I go over and get cut off because I am not really paying attention to how much tome I have. Since moving to Venezuela I discovered something even better than repaid international calling cards. I have a cell phone here that lets me text message internationally for a fairly cheap price. Now I simply text message my parents or friends when I want them to call me and they do. It is much cheaper this way, at least for me and much more convenient because I can tell them when is a good time to call.When I left I thought I was going to be sending a lot of money on prepaid international calling cards. However since I got here I have not spent one dime. I know that phone service here is pretty expensive so people do not make phone calls on a regular basis. For this reason I revel in my text messaging capabilities.
