Plenty of Llanishen's streets are lined with 1930s semis, and plenty of those semis have a garage at the side with a flat felt roof. Around Llanishen Reservoir and up towards Thornhill, these houses sit alongside post-war homes and detached properties, and they have their own familiar set of roofing problems. Redland Roofing Cardiff, a family-owned business with over 30 years in the trade, works on roofs like these right across north Cardiff. For homeowners wanting roofers in Cardiff who understand this kind of house, here's what tends to go wrong and how it gets put right. Most 1930s and post-war semis in Llanishen now carry concrete interlocking tiles. They're heavy, hard-wearing and usually last well, but the weak points are at the edges. Ridge tiles bedded in mortar loosen as the mortar cracks, and south-westerly gales can lift them or strip them off altogether. The verges at the gable end suffer in the same way. Redland Roofing Cardiff replaces and refixes ridge tiles, fits dry verge caps that do away with crumbling verge mortar, and swaps out cracked or broken tiles. Vent covers, gutters, fascias and roof tiling Cardiff soffits get checked at the same visit, because a blocked gutter can soon soak a fascia board that's already ageing. Then there's the garage. Felt flat roofs on garages are some of the most neglected roofs in Cardiff. The felt dries, cracks and blisters, water sits in the dips, and leaves from the gardens and tree-lined roads around Llanishen and Thornhill clog the edges. When a felt garage roof has reached the end of its life, the usual answer is to strip it back, fit new tongue-and-groove sterling board decking and finish with an EPDM rubber membrane. Flat roof replacement is mentioned in nine of the firm's Google reviews. Conservatory roof replacement is another common job on these homes, where an older conservatory roof has started to leak or look tired.
