

Choose a small, comfortable bouquet in colors the child likes, with sturdy flowers that can survive the trip home. Check for allergies and theatre rules, then plan to give it after the performance so there is nothing to carry onstage.

Start with the child

Think about what the child enjoys rather than what looks most formal. A favorite color is a useful starting point. Bright yellow flowers can feel cheerful, while pink, purple, or white may suit a child who prefers softer colors. A mix is fine too.

Keep the bouquet light enough for the child to hold easily. A few stems can make a lovely gift, especially when arranged with a little greenery. Ask the florist to keep the stems short enough to manage and to cover any sharp ends.

Consider the child's age and habits as well. A very young child may be happier with a simple bundle that is easy to carry. For an older child, you might choose flowers that reflect a color in the costume or a detail from the show, if you know it.

Pick practical flowers

Look for flowers with firm stems and petals that do not seem bruised or loose. Carnations, chrysanthemums, and alstroemeria are options to consider. Ask what is fresh and likely to hold up without water during the journey to and from the theatre.

A few checks can make the gift easier to enjoy:

- Choose a small bouquet that will not block the child's face in photos.
- Ask about allergies or scent sensitivity before selecting fragrant flowers.
- Avoid thorny stems, or ask for the thorns to be removed.
- Use simple wrapping that the child can grip without slipping.

If you are unsure about allergies, check with a parent or caregiver. They may also know if there are pets at home, since some flowers can be harmful to animals. A florist can help you choose with that in mind.

Plan the presentation

Bring the flowers to the performance, but keep them out of the way until the curtain call is over. The child may need to change out of costume or meet the rest of the cast before seeing family and friends. Follow the theatre's instructions about where to wait and where gifts can be given.

A short card makes the bouquet more personal. You might write, “I loved watching you onstage,” or mention a moment you enjoyed. There is no need to judge the performance or compare the child with anyone else.

Make the trip home easier

Keep the bouquet out of direct sun and away from heat while you travel. If it will be out of water for a long time, ask for the stem ends to be wrapped in a damp material and covered to prevent leaks.

At home, an adult can trim the stems and put the flowers in a clean vase of water. Remove leaves that would sit below the waterline, and change the water regularly.

The best bouquet is one the child can enjoy without fuss. A few fresh flowers and a kind note are enough to mark the occasion.

Have a look at https://tencowmedia.com/how-a-local-florist-builds-a-loyal-customer-base-a-small/